Looks to me like we have three possibilities here: One: ice Age Mariners followed Atlantic currents along the sea-ice edge to colonize North America far earlier than previously suspected. Two: a similar idea proposes that other Paleolithic Mariners from South East Asia/Siberia followed the ice front of the North Pacific to eventually settle on the western seaboard of the Americas, well before 13,000 YBP.

According to the now familiar story, hunters entered the continent some 12,000 years ago from Siberia crossing a land bridge that spanned the Bering Sea. These early New World people, known as by their distinctive stone tools, came to be known as the Clovis culture. Across the Atlantic Ice boldly challenges this old narrative and presents overwhelming evidence for a pre-Clovis occupation of the American continents, and finds virtually no direct evidence that the progenitors of Clovis came ...
