The String object is immutable while StringBuilder object is mutable. Both String and StringBuilder are reference type. But String acts like a value type. StringBuilder is located in the System.Text namespace. The System.Text.StringBuilder class can be used when you want to modify a string without creating a new object.

Since String is the recommended alias for the AnsiString class, there's no reason to use the name AnsiString in your C++Builder programs. The String class, like the other C++ classes, has several functions to make string manipulation easier. The class's constructors allow you to create a String object from a char*, an int, or a double.
